Rawan Al Mahrouqi, an Omani artist, is a spokesperson for women

♦ MARY PHILIP MUSCAT

RAWAN AL MAHROUQI, an Omani artist, is a spokesperson for women's liberty.

Almost all her works speak about her intense longing for freedom.

"You can say I am obsessed with it. Having had my freedom taken away from me when I was young, I found myself always trying to take it back and I'm not sure if I will ever stop. It's embedded in me."

She is a feminist through and thorough. "I have always thought strongly about the double standards in my society and I hated it since I was a child. So I always create works that speak on gender equality and basic human rights."

Rawan finds inspiration from people around her and her artist friends.

"When we all meet together at the gallery, I find more ideas as we discuss with each other. I don't just paint any person at any pose or stage. Whenever I want to paint someone, I take the photographs myself. I try to capture the person as I see them. And then I paint from the reference photos I have taken."

She says she loved doing portraits from her childhood.

"I have been always drawing. My mother tells me I would constantly draw on the walls too. I remember sketching when I was young. I think I only started painting when I was a teenager. I'm all self-taught. Maybe if I had taken classes I think I would have started painting earlier!"

She uses sculpture, animation, illustration, drawing and installation art for her medium of expression.

"My style of painting is realistic when I do these portraits I love working on hyperrealism because to me it's like meditation, I am so focused on my work that I forget about everything else. I usually find myself drawn to darker, calmer colours. I also really love blue", she says.

For Rawan, each painting means different things to different people. So she does not want to define what the viewer sees in her works. It is open to each one's own perspective.

"There are many aspects

to each painting. I don't like to say this is what I mean by this painting because it means different things for different people and I don't want to stand in its way," she says.

Her subjects are more often women and always preferred to draw or paint girls from her childhood days.

"I'm not sure why it is so. Maybe because it is much easier for me to create something that looks like me. It comes naturally to me," she smiles.

Her portraits of two people, who are significant in her life, reveal the underlying strength and beauty of a character she wanted to portray. Her works bare out the underlying theme of the intense struggle for freedom women have always sought and been denied eternally.

Her painting 'Maryam' is on her intimate friend. "It represents life, light and youth. It is a merging of my best friend and me. It is all about two women feeling lost and looking for some freedom, yet staying content and serene at the same time," she says.

Her second painting 'Untitled' captures an elderly woman slowly sipping tea in the morning and in deep pensive thought. Her profound contemplation underlines Rawan's explanation that this work documents a difficult time in her life.

"The older woman is a family member of mine, who is actually much younger than she looks in the painting, but the years and troubles she has been through seems to have aged her in that moment. It was a time full of uncertainty and darkness for her," she says. "There was this need for a wee bit of light to fill up the dark room of her life. I tried to capture that quiet moment of her drinking tea with a play on light and shadows to symbolise her hiding perhaps."

Rawan wanted to portray multiple emotions of fear, love, freedom, confusion and despair. She says, "The feelings in both painting are opposites but love is common."

She has participated in nine exhibitions until now, the majority being in Oman with the exception of one in Sharjah and two in London. She has received the best presentation award at the Stal Gallery Emerging Artists in 2015. Besides being a certified makeup artist, she also does commissioned paintings.

Rawan dreams of travelling around the world with her art and have success in her career.

Sculpture, illustration, reading and animation are among her passions. She uses a lot of different mediums from water colours to oil paints. She says, "I don't like to restrict myself to one medium. It depends on my mood."
